

By the time you read this, I'll be back from studying abroad. I know that seems like it's been forever since I left for Spain and my parents are probably getting really worried about me, but I assure you that everything is fine (now that they've seen my last email). I'm not the only one who's attending school over Spring Break; over 190 students spanning six countries are also participating in this program. We all met online with Skype interviews to find out more about our group and what we will do during our semester-long stay together (all of your favorite beach activities, games of soccer against locals, etc.). It was fun to watch the process too. We interviewed each group member for their own blog posts, on which I'll include some excerpts. And then we started to plan what we wanted to do together. One of the main things was soccer. We are all great soccer players at home, but none of us had ever played together before. It was sorta like high school all over again! The night before leaving, our VP called a meeting to tell us more about how it works and what we would need in order to get transportation and housing (in another country) sorted out. We all enjoyed ourselves, but I noticed that the flight was really close. I had to email my group right away to make sure that everyone was on track for everything. They were, but not me! I managed to get on the right flight but ended up missing two of my three bags (luggage). After an awful flight home with huge suitcases, I arrived at my house around 2 am. I've been back for over a week now and have slowly gotten caught up on housework and homework so I can start practicing once again. We had our first soccer game last weekend against some local high schoolers. Despite our lack of team-building beforehand, we played very well. We scored some goals and made some great passes. I'm looking forward to more games this week! Classes at San Francisco State University are going very well. My classes are on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays. I work about 60 hours on my other job on Mondays and Wednesdays, so it's tough juggling everything. It's a lot of work but everything is going well so far! My classes include Psychology of Music, Introduction to Theatre, Communications in a Digital World, and Sustainable Energy Systems. The theatre class is different than anything I've ever done. It's very performance-based and I've never had to act in front of that many people, but it's fun!

I'm sure that there are some other things that I could be doing, but this is pretty much the gist of my Spring Break. It's amazing how much work I find myself having to do even when I'm not at school. Hope this email finds you all well! Hope to see you later this week for our next game. We play May 15th at 4 p.m.; if you want to come, let me know! Nicole
